In short, honey bees make honey as a way of storing food to eat over the cooler winter period, when they are unable to forage and there are fewer flowers from which to gather food. Honey is ideal for bees - it is full of nutrients and is a great energy food, because it is high in sugars. Bees need two different kinds of foods for their survival. One is the honey they make from the nectar collected from flowers. The other comes from the anthers of the flowers; bees feed on the pollen grains that come in a variety of colors. Bees make honey because it is their food, particularly for the cold winter months when there are no blooming flowers with pollen. Why Do Bees Make Honey? Bees make honey for food to store and stockpile in the hive. How Do Bees Make Honey? 1. The busy forager bee (worker bee) collects nectar and stores it in her honey stomach. 2. Once back in the hive, she regurgitates her nectar into a processor bees mouth. 3. The processor bee then spits it into a honeycomb cell.
